Good dull husbands are hard to find." Sidney Sheldon, Morning, Noon & Night. I just did a reread of this book and found it as splendid as ever. It is a classic mystery and has all the components that go into a great Sheldon novel. In Morning, Noon and Night, he presents a summa of his reading and places it in the context of the cycles of growing up and growing old that all of us experience. The breadth of his reading itself is miraculous - the book covers everything from Oedipus to Shakespeare to Faulkner and Joyce to Jonathan Safran Foer (and multitudes in between) and gives each writer the careful and original reading he or she deserves. Arnold Weinstein is a brilliant lecturer and writer. I have taken two courses from him on literature which have contributed to my understanding and enjoyment of both classics on other fine books. As a result of these experiences, I have just finished reading "Morning, Noon, and Night".
