Selected Poems 1930-1989. Edited by David Wheatley. Contents. At the time, though, the book passed almost without notice: "five lines of faint damn in Dublin Mag", as Beckett lamented to Thomas MacGreevy, with the added insult that many of Beckett's friends, already familiar with the poems, refused to buy copies. "Getting known", as Krapp declared, contemplating his "seventeen copies sold". His own poetry has been translated into at least ten languages. Joseph Brodsky: Selected Poems was published by Penguin Books in London (1973), and by Harper & Row in New York (1974), translated by George L. Kline and with a foreword by W.H. Auden. A volume of Brodsky's selected poems translated in French has been published by Gallimard; a German translation, by Piper Verlag; and an Italian translation, by Mondadori and Adelphi.
