Perritt Jr. Employee Rights in the Workplace: Employees have a set of basic responsibilities that they must follow in every organization, but besides these responsibilities there are also few rights that the employees can ask for. Employees would be glad to know that getting annual paid holidays is not a benefit but a right that they can ask from the company. Every company needs to fix a certain number of fixed holidays to the employee. If an employee is offered with a safe working environment then there are less possibilities of experiencing any accident or mishap. But still, if an unexpected accident happens at the workplace, then employees have the right to claim the medical expenditure from the company. Those rights will vary from state to state. To the extent an employee has an expectation of privacy, whether well-founded or not, employers can reduce or eliminate that expectation by implementing clear policies that communicate to the workforce that the employer reserves the right to surveil, search, track and/or monitor. Privacy issues can become more complicated for employers who telework. As employees are brought back to work, employers are well-advised to implement COVID-19 related safety protocols in the workplace. And while I do not know of a legal duty in the United States of self-reporting to others, it is not much of a stretch to compare their silence now with that of people who have been jailed for knowingly spreading herpes and AIDS. The Workright initiative helps employees and employers understand their rights and obligations respectively in accordance with the Employment Act and CPF Act. What is Workright. Launched in 2012 by MOM and CPF Board, Workright seeks to raise awareness of and national compliance with the Employment Act and the CPF Act. Workright conducts annual education campaigns through media publicity and on-ground roadshows in the heartlands. Workright inspectors also conduct workplace visits to ensure employers comply with employment laws. What should I know as an employee.
