

Writing: Texts, Processes and Practices / 9781317882732 / 344 pages / 2014 / Routledge, 2014 / Christopher N. Candlin, Ken Hyland

Process Writing To define this approach before mentioning its history and implications, Process Writing is an approach that emphasizes on the process and the fluency of writing, rather than the product and the accuracy (Onozawa, 2010). In this approach, as opposed to finishing a work in a limited amount of time is not crucial or suggested, writer is encouraged to follow several steps before declaring their works finished. A similar view of this approach is suggested by Brown (2001, as cited in Onozawa), by stating that what is written finally is succeeded only when the writer undergoes a process of thinking. There are a few versions of this approach and in every version the steps the writer takes upon writing are slightly different. The writing process involves researching the topic, planning the structure, drafting the text, revising, editing and proofreading. This process can be quite non-linear. For example, it's reasonable to begin writing with the main body of the text, saving the introduction for later once you have a clearer idea of the text you're introducing. To give structure to your writing, use your outline as a framework. Make sure that each paragraph has a clear central focus that relates to your overall argument. He writes and edits for Scribbr, and reads a lot of books in his spare time. Other students also liked. Research paper outline. Books. Methodology in Language Teaching. The Writing Process and Process Writing. Methodology in Language Teaching. Methodology in Language Teaching. An Anthology of Current Practice. Search within full text. Chapter. Chapter. Iranian EFL teachers' beliefs and practices regarding writing activities and class organization. Cogent Education, Vol. 6, Issue. 1, p. 1651812. In Practical ideas for teaching writing as a process. Sacramento: California State Department of Education. Freedman, Dyson, Flower, & Chafe, (1987).