Every business has a legal right to protect sensitive, private or mission-critical information it shares within a contract agreement. A nondisclosure clause establishes a legal right to confidentiality as it pertains to information not publicly or widely known. A standard nondisclosure clause defines information -- including trade secrets, financial data or new product development plans -- that your business considers private. It ensures that your business retains legal ownership rights to physical products, trademarks, patents and copyrights. The clause defines intellectual property, establishes your business as the legal owner -- often via an assignment statement -- and identifies authorized users. Download now.
