Add a gift receipt for easy returns. Buy usedÂ I love that it is pro co-sleeping and explains how to do so safely. I had always let people make me feel bad for decisions I make as a parent that I feel are best for my child. Never again. I had a very difficult, long labor and ended up having a c-section. Co-sleeping made it easier to breastfeed my child and helped me get the rest I needed to recover. We still co-sleep and it works out great for us. I know it's not for everyone, but we have no tears at bedtime and our daughter sleeps peacefully through the night knowing that we're nearby if she needs us. School-age children need between 9 and 11 hours of sleep each night, according to the National Sleep Foundation. But thereâ€™s a lot of variability in sleep needs and patterns. Most kids have patterns that donâ€™t change much, no matter what you do. Early risers will still rise early even if you put them to bed later, and night owls wonâ€™t fall asleep until their bodies are ready.Â Set a wake-up time based on how much sleep your child needs and what time they go to bed. Woods recommends creating a wake-up routine as early as the preschool years to help prevent stress for parents down the road. And remember to be consistent with the schedule. Allowing your child to sleep later on weekends is generous, but could backfire in the long run. Babies need to learn how and when to sleep before sleeping through the night. Once they're ready, our 8 tips will help your little one start sleeping for those longer stretches. To understand how to get your baby to sleep through the night, you first need to know if your baby is able to sleep through the night. You can also help set the stage for a good night's sleep by making sure your baby is getting the right amount of sleep during the day.Â 4. Follow a schedule. Make sure your baby is getting the right amount of daytime sleep to prepare them to get the right amount of nighttime sleep. As newborns, babies canâ€™t differentiate between day and night, they just sleep â€”round the clock. As they get older, they start sleeping longer periods, the longest stretches being at night. Nighttime Parenting helps parents understand why babies sleep differently than adults, offers solutions to nighttime problems, and even describes how certain styles of nighttime parenting can aid in child spacing and lower the risks of Sudden Infant Death Syndrome.
